Active military member, student graduates with two degrees, eye toward a doctorate

Chad Brack grew up on a small farm just outside the city of Duncan, Oklahoma. Both of his parents were military veterans. Brack's father served in Vietnam as a helicopter pilot and his mother served as a nurse in the Air Force. Growing up, Brack was always interested in the military and planned to join the service as soon as he was old enough. However, his plans changed during his junior year of high school when he was diagnosed with asthma, a condition that would prevent him from serving in the armed forces.

Brack's diagnosis was a turning point in his life. He began to explore other career paths and eventually discovered his passion for philosophy. He attended Arizona State University (ASU), where he earned two degrees in philosophy and the arts, with a minor in computer science.

Brack's first degree, a bachelor of arts in philosophy, was completed in May 2021. He is currently pursuing a master of arts in philosophical studies, which he plans to complete in May 2022. He is also a member of the military, serving in the army reserves.

Brack is currently working on a PhD in philosophy, which he plans to complete in 2023. He hopes to use his education to make a difference in the world, and he is currently working on a project that explores the intersection of philosophy and military ethics.

Brack is an active member of the ASU community. He has been involved in numerous organizations, including the Philosophy Club and the Military and Veterans Alliance. He is also a member of the ASU Veterans Affairs Advisory Board.

Brack is an active contributor to the ASU community, and he is frequently asked to speak at events and seminars. He is a passionate advocate for the military, and he hopes to use his education to make a difference in the world.
